If you are re-taking classes to refresh yourself, that is one thing—but you should also know that not all schools have a "shelf life" on pre-med classes. I think it is a misperception to think that medical schools don't like to accept nursing students. If you are burned out, unsure about medicine, or just want to explore the world, schools are generally okay with you getting it out of your system before you come knocking on the door.

This sentiment is perhaps most legible to those who are experiencing the burnout. I would spend time explaining your situation and then talking about what you have gained from this "detour. That will at least give you an idea of what successful applicants wrote in the last year.

Confirmation from the health professions committee or individuals writing said, the "what" and "why" are very critical aspects you must cover when you apply.
